Motivation Reflection

For me, motivation is a very big part of studying. I've been pushing myself to study and succeed for years because it's very important to me to be smart and aware of what's happening in the world around me. I feel like I'm most motivated when I'm in a school system like high school or college. It's harder for me to set dates for myself. Of course, I'm only human, so there are times when I need more motivation. So I have ways to help me. One of them is when I give myself a can of drink for every hour of work or episode of a series. Sometimes when I have a very big job like a job at the end of the semester, I go out to a cafe and it gives me motivation to work without having to get up and look for something else to do.

I learned that my motivation is greatly affected by stress, and because I'm afraid of getting stuck, when I use small rewards or go somewhere inspiring, I manage to maintain perseverance and not be too stressed and complete tasks even when they are difficult. This shows that I have elements of GRIT, because I am able to persevere and overcome challenges through strategies that keep me focused. Another thing is that I understand that when I focus on learning and personal progress instead of perfection, I develop a growth mindset that helps me stay motivated even when it's difficult and builds me as a person. This understanding helps me better plan my work in the future and recognize that motivation is something that can be developed because it won't come by itself.
